Methods And Apparatus. 1. Locality. As the water emerges as a spring from beneath a hanging slope, it flows into a small pond whence it is conducted out to a gently sloping bed by a short iron pipe. The pond serves as a reservoir, the water flowing in a constant and permanent stream from the pipe throughout the year. The water flows with fairly constant velocity and is free from all sediment. The gently sloping bed in front of the pipe is therefore an undisturbed and ideal locality for the breeding work. 2. Breeding The Naiads. Ten newly hatched naiads were placed with food, each in a small shell-vial that was filled with water, stopped with a piece of bolting-silk and fastened with a rubber ring. All the vials were put in a shallow enamel tray which was sunk into the bed of the stream just a little below the water level. A piece of stone was laid on top of the vials to prevent them from being washed away. Thus the experiment began in July, 1921. 3. Recording The Instars. Visits were made to this breeding station daily or every other day. Each vial was given a definite number and was carefully examined on every trip. When exuviae were found they were taken out and each preserved in a vial of alcohol, with a label of date and the number of the vial from which it was taken. In this...
